University Entrance in Japan

Peter Gabites

Like so many other parents in Japan the last six months has been quite a hectic time with two daughters preparing to enter university in April. In our case there has been the added complication of whether they should study in Japan or overseas and my own ambivalence about Japan's university system. However April 1st has now been and gone and our daughters are already coming to terms with university life and the excitement of living by themselves in Tokyo. We now just have to concentrate on paying for everything and hope that they make the most of the opportunities they are given.

As a New Zealander I am a product of a far simpler university system where internal high school assessment is the main criterion for entering any of our national universities and our version of the "Centre Test" was used by these universities to select students for elite courses like medicine and law. Once you had entered you were expected to study hard and many who failed to make the transition to a freer, less regulated educational environment soon found themselves looking for full time employment. So as an outsider the almost "holiday-like" reputation of Japanese universities (or at least undergraduate studies) left me less than impressed.

However, the decision was not mine to make and my daughters were eager to study in Japan. They were particularly attracted by the more social nature of Japanese universities where students develop completely new social networks that will play important roles in their adult lives. In comparison their Australian friends were busier studying and supporting themselves with part time jobs and socialized more with old high school friends. Ultimately, it was the opportunity to enter a whole new world of social experiences that attracted them to Japanese universities.

If only the entrance process had been easier though: the extra studies, the exams, the forms to be filled out, the interviews and lots of travelling between Niihama and Tokyo. The stress of it all, but at least we had the security of knowing that they had already been accepted at an Australian university if they were unsuccessful at getting into one of the universities they were applying for in Japan. Plus it was kind of interesting to look at how the different Japanese universities handled the entrance process ~ those that were more internationally focussed, flexible and helpful and those that were more conservative and rigid.

Once we got the official acceptances we could relax and even wonder how our daughters had been lucky enough to get into their first choice university. Then came the more practical matter of setting up an apartment in Tokyo for them and either buying or sending their things up there from Niihama. (Perhaps Australia would have been a better option after all as none of that would have been necessary?)

However, on April 1st there we were, like thousands of other proud parents around Japan, sitting in a somewhat uncomfortable stadium, watching professors in colourful robes welcome fresh-faced new students into a new and important stage of their lives. (A new experience for myself, as strangely in New Zealand we don't celebrate or even recognize the start of university studies, only their successful completion.) And then for me the most exciting part of the day, running the "gauntlet" of literally hundreds of circle members trying to entice the freshmen into their clubs. A fitting sign that they were now truly university students. I guess we can relax now for the next four years until it will be our older son's turn to decide where he wants to go to university.

I am/was a long term foreign resident of Niihama and lived here for nearly 20 years teaching English. At the moment I live in Australia while my sons are going to school there but we visit Niihama regularly and I look forward to returning here to live once the boys finish their education. "Hello to all my old students and friends."

Exploring Restaurants: Spicy Niihama

No. 8

Coco

by Michael Newlin

If you are looking for some truly spicy food in Niihama, think about trying Coco Ichi Ramen (not Coco Ichiban Curry House). For some spice, try the Karashi Tsukemen which comes with a spice mixture you add yourself. For the dedicated spice lover, the Kukyoku Tan Tan Men has five spice levels you can select. The geki kurai (very spicy) level is a surprise! Additionally, the karaage is different, light, and excellent. Directions: Across the street from Gusto, near Niihama City Hall.
